

1240-1 Tagua Carvings from Ecuador

Tagua nuts are from the Tagua palm, also known as ivory or ivory-nut palm. Tagua nuts are often substituted for elephant ivory because of their resemblance to elephant ivory. Most Tagua nuts measure approximately 2½" by 1½". There are no problems with USDA or USFWS importing or exporting these products. (Phytelephas aequatorialis).

TAGUA NUT CARVINGS

Tagua nuts are harvested in South America from the Tagua palm, also known as ivory palm or ivory-nut palm. This fair-trade, handmade collectibles are environmentally friendly and meant to be treasured. These are some of the finest quality Tagua carvings we have seen anywhere. (Phytelephas aequatorialis).

Indigenous Made in Ecuador

Please note: As these are hand carved items there will be slight variations from piece to piece. There will also be variation in the color and texture of the carvings. Just as the wood grain varies in trees, the composition of each tagua nut can present variations. For example, some pieces may have lines or marks due to the natural grain of the nut. When tagua nuts are heated, they will become a darker brown color and some will darken in some places more than others. Some tagua nuts are more cream-colored, whereas others are more white. The nuts have, and will also develop, a natural patina, which can be more pronounced in some than in others. This is the beauty of working with natural materials -- each piece is a little bit unique!

Indigenous Made in Ecuador

Tagua (pronounced TAH-gwa), also called ivory nut or vegetable ivory, is a small nut grown on a palm tree in the rainforests of South America. It is a renewable resource, unlike ivory. In a single year, a tagua palm tree can produce up to 20 pounds of nuts and continues to produce year after year. Your purchase helps protect elephants from the illegal ivory trade and foster a respect for the rainforests, which are disappearing at an alarming rate.
